At UKG, our purpose is people™.

Every year, an international team of UKG researchers, thought leaders, and social scientists partner to reflect on the previous year's developments, evaluate the implications for executives and their HR teams, and predict how these forces will shape organizations and the industry for years to come.

People are struggling to adapt to an era of relentless change and uncertainty. In 2022, these tensions reached a tipping point due to compounding economic instability, climate change, violence, and political unrest. The impact on organizations and their people is — and will continue to be — substantial.

Based on these daunting challenges that are having a significant impact on workers and workplaces, UKG has identified three major trends set to impact organizations on a global scale in 2023 and beyond:

THE GEN X EFFECT

Navigating The Human Energy Crisis

People of all backgrounds are now experiencing a level of chronic anxiety that's significantly affecting their ability to operate. Being overwhelmed in this way consumes energy that employees would normally use in their personal and professional lives — it's incredibly difficult to prioritize creativity over fear. The negative impacts on culture, retention, performance, and innovation are mounting, leaving organizations wondering how they can reduce stress for employees even when the majority of anxiety sources are external and out of anyone's direct control.

Megatrend rundown:

- The mix of stressors for different countries and people of different backgrounds varies, but they've led to an increase in clinically diagnosed anxiety issues across the board
- Experts agree the best treatment for these diverse disorders — even when external factors are the cause — is helping people to lead less stressful lives whenever possible
- Employers have a critical opportunity to become an anchor of stability for their employees by meeting the right kinds of needs at the right times

What You Can Do

Sixty-eight percent of employees say improving their wellbeing is now more important than advancing their career, but the top two hurdles to getting there are heavy, stressful workloads and long work hours. Make sure you're finding meaningful ways to address common stressors weighing heavily on your people by focusing on the moments that matter to them in life and work with the HR technology you use.

Here are three examples of how you can tap in to the different levels of need your employees have and provide tangible support:

Safety and Autonomy

Put operational processes in place that foster physical and mental wellbeing in the day to day through fair, flexible, and personal scheduling. Giving your people more direct control over when, where, and how they work while consistently and automatically following safety standards and giving guidance to managers can help boost employee confidence, promote life-work synergy, and reduce stress.

2 Optimizing Organizational Plasticity

With all the mounting external pressures we've just discussed weighing on employees, there's also a growing impulse to fall back into pre-pandemic patterns and behaviors. In reality, though, organizations that can continually rewire and adapt will not only survive but thrive during unexpected challenges. Organizations must learn to adopt a growth mindset and seize opportunities during times of great change and challenge, taking calculated risks and learning fast in order to succeed.

Megatrend rundown:

- Organizations can learn from how the human brain develops — constantly remodeling based on new experiences — to focus on actions and connections that create positive experiences and increase innovation
- Doubling down on culture and diversity, equity, inclusion, and belonging (DEI&B) is the most effective path to recession-proofing an organization and increasing agility and growth
- Strategic investments in workforce management and planning tools set up sustainable and flexible operational processes that can adapt and grow with employers quickly

3 The Gen X Effect

Amid all the other changes we've discussed, there is also a profound shift happening at the leadership level of many organizations. As baby boomers have continued to retire in greater numbers, Gen Xers have been put in the driver's seat in the C-suite and as board members, bringing with them a new perspective on what it means to be an ethical leader. This represents an opportunity for a broader grassroots movement by employers of all types to redefine corporate behavior standards and deepen their commitment to corporate social responsibility (CSR) and environmental, social, and governance (ESG) initiatives.

Megatrend rundown:

- Gen X leaders' increased prioritization of CSR and ESG initiatives leads to better performance and higher market value for their organizations
- This shift in leadership demographics brings a different perspective on the value of diversity and inclusion at the boardroom level, often increasing total firm value
- Succession planning and broader and formalized approaches to ESG will be critical in maximizing Gen X's leadership impact
